

Sources found for Jack Congo Murral

1. The Story of the Blacks. The Aborigines of Australia (11th November 1904)

<http://trove.nla.gov.au/newspaper/article/221485189?searchTerm=Jack%20Congo%20Murral%20Aboriginal%20Hunter&searchLimits=sortBy=dateAsc>

The Story of the Blacks. The Aborigines of Australia

In 1828, when judge Dowling arrived in the colony, the opinion prevailed that the Supreme Court could not take cognisance of offences committed amongst the aborigines, and in one or two instances the court, from the difficulty of administering justice between them, according to the rules of the English law, forbore trying those individual cases. In April, 1836, however, the question was raised before the Supreme Court of Sydney, in the case of an aboriginal named Jack Congo Murral, arraigned for the murder of another aboriginal named Jabinguy.

2. The Story of the Blacks. The Aborigines of Australia (16th March 1905)

<http://trove.nla.gov.au/newspaper/article/133122401?searchTerm=Jack%20Congo%20Murral%20Aboriginal%20Hunter&searchLimits=sortBy=dateAsc>

The Story of the Blacks.

In 1828, when judge Dowling arrived in the colony, the opinion prevailed that the Supreme Court could not take cognisance of offences committed amongst the aborigines, and in one or two instances the court, from the difficulty of administering justice between them, according to the rules English law, forbore trying thoses individual cases. In April 1836, however, the question was raised before the Supreme Court of Sydney, in the case of an aboriginal named Jack Congo Murral, arraigned for the murder of another aboriginal named Jabinguy, and it formed one of the most peculiar cases in the annals of Colonial criminal jurisprudence.

This ariticle also mentioned aboriginal names: Long Jack, Talbay, alias.